ZANE: [deadpan] ...so that's the whole pitch. You rent a conference room — nothing fancy, a Marriott ballroom, some folding chairs — and it's a workshop for English speakers who are dead serious about improving their Japanese accents.

SHANE: [confused] Improving their— [laughs] their Japanese accents?

ZANE: [matter-of-fact] Serious people only. No tourists.

SHANE: Zane, buddy... [hesitant] this sounds — and I wanna be careful here — this sounds a little offensive.

ZANE: [dryly] See, that's exactly why it's for serious people only.

SHANE: [skeptical] How does that fix it?

ZANE: Because if anybody laughs, [firmly] they're out. Escorted from the building. This is academic.

SHANE: [laughs] Okay, so picture the instructor up front. [doing a Japanese accent] "Okay everyone, please repeat after me. Welcome to da conference, dis way to da seminar." And nobody's allowed to crack up?

ZANE: [deadpan] Stone faces. Clipboards out. [doing a Japanese accent] "Berry good. Now we order da chicken teriyaki, please. Extra rice."

SHANE: [bursts out laughing] You just laughed at your own —

ZANE: [interrupting, flat] I'm the instructor. I'm allowed. [beat] You, though — you'd be ejected.

SHANE: [incredulous] What's the certificate even say?

ZANE: [proudly] "Certified. Eight-week program." There's a final exam, too. You gotta order a full meal — [doing a Japanese accent] "I rike da ramen, extra noodle, no onion, sankyu" — without one single witness smiling.

SHANE: [sighs] And if one guy in the back giggles?

ZANE: [flatly] Whole class fails. Everybody pays again.

SHANE: [laughs] Dude, you've built a scam.

ZANE: [deadpan] I've built a school.
